

3 UFC HOT TAKES WHICH MIGHT CAUSE A WAR

UFC has been growing through time. With the recent White House Freedom event, UFC gained massive attention all over the world. Fight fans tuned in from different parts of the world to witness an absolute banger of an event. I watched almost all the fights and was thrilled throughout. However, I always ponder on these 3 takes which leave room for a whole lot of controversial opinions. Have a read, this is going to be an interesting one.

1. Charles Oliveira should nowhere be close to a legend or a GOAT conversation.

Yes. Starting off strong here, and honestly, a take which can disappoint many. The Brazilian started his career way back in 2010 and is still fighting. He started off his UFC career with back-to-back wins in style by finishing both fights with submissions. He went on a four-fight win streak which ended with the Holloway fight in 2015, in which he was injured.

He staged his incredible comeback with an 11-fight win streak and finally got his hands on the elusive belt. The 11-fight win streak is impressive, but leading up to the belt, almost all of his opponents had double-digit losses: fighters with 10 losses in their career and no accolades. He faced a washed-up Tony Ferguson for his fight before the title fight. The title fight was with Michael Chandler, who has barely been able to set foot in the UFC.

All I am saying is he did not face a real matchup, except the Dustin fight to some extent. As soon as he faced an elite wrestler in Makhachev, he was drawn to deep waters and it was over. With Ilia, he was flatlined even quicker. Legends know when to take a step back in a sport. Sadly, Charles is out there in the dangerous business taking numerous brain injuries, which isn't helping anything. A great fighter? Absolutely. Legend? No.

2. Jon Jones should not be in the GOAT conversation.

GOAT conversations are never-ending. They really don't have an answer. This applies to all sports. But I believe Jon Jones should be kept out of this debate. Jon Jones is an absolute tank of a person: incredible agility, a monstrous athlete, hard-hitting punches and kicks which can send you to a shadow realm. Dude has abs on his love handles. How is that even possible?!

Anyway, getting back, a GOAT is someone whom you look up to. A GOAT is a person who behaves and has good conduct outside his sporting life as well, a respected human being in the outside world. Is it possible to say that for Jones? Drinking and driving, a hit-and-run case, and crashing his Bentley.

Does that make him the worst kind of human? Probably not. Does that take away his fighting skills? No chance, dude is going to beat every single person on this planet in hand-to-hand combat. But yes, it does keep him out of the GOAT conversation, as he isn't really a person whom you could look up to.

3. Khabib's dominance doesn't get the respect it deserves.

Final one. Okay, I am going to be attacked for the fact that he only had 13 fights in the UFC, and fought absolute cans in the lead-up to his UFC career. Basically, the fact is that his resume is not stacked. Khabib is rated low by people because he built his fight career around wrestling, which isn't really a style you'd watch for 25 minutes. People want blood. Blood sells. Khabib never shed a drop of blood in UFC, and neither did his opponents, though. That's the fact which people generally skip.

He used to come and then maul people like amateurs. He made his opponents look like amateurs. He lost only a single debatable round in his UFC career. He had 10-7 rounds, which is far more dominant than knocking someone out, but then again, it's not entertaining.

Imagine being so good that you change your method of submission mid-match so that you don't break your opponent's arm, and instead force him to sleep. He did this to Justin. Imagine being so good that you force yourself into a guillotine only to gas him out, and then choke him in the literal same position a minute later. I rest my case.

Thanks for the read.
